SATURDAY......JUNE 28, 1890.

From the Bench to a Drunkard's Grave.

November 20, as the solemn pall of evening was gathering around the great city of Chicago, an old man, clad in little else than rags, and tottering with the infirmities of age, entered one of the many drinking houses on South Desplaines street, at the corner of School. He entered by the side door, very quietly, with the evident intention of being left unnoticed. And so it was. The bar-tender hardly glanced up from his seat behind the counter, and the old man dropped into a chair near the battered stove | to a big stock, we have inaugurated a in the corner. He sat quite still for several minutes, with his head inclined forward, chin resting upon his breast. Then his hands dopped listlessly to his sides, the muscles of his limbs relaxed, his body slipped downward to one side, fell in a below regular prices. rude, limp heap to the floor, and William W. Drummond, who once wore the judicial ermine of the United States, and was recognized as one of the eminent jurists of his time, was dead—dead in a barrel house, the resort of the lowest of the low characters of a great city; dead among people with whom he had lived for years—yet he had once been a Chief Justice for the United States. In 1853, when a young man of eminent abilities and a promising future, he was appointed Chief Justice of Utah by President Pierce. After his appointment, though he had an elegant family consisting of his wife, four daughters and one son, be fell into the hands of a dissolute woman, who dragged him down to ruin. He abandoned his family, and after two years in NEW GOODS Utah he resigned, returned to Chicago to practice law. But his reputation was blasted, and drink became the foe which finished what the woman had begun. For eight years he had eked out a miserable existence by various disgraceful practices, lived in cheap boarding houses, sometimes begging DRY GOODS. from house to house, and finally died in one of the lowest resorts on Desplaines street. Oh, what sin leads men to! ----Women at the Dentist's.—The Chicago Tribune quotes a leading dentist of that city as saying: Women have most of their dentistry done before marriage. Men do STRAW HATS, not give them the credit they deserve in this. If women were as selfish as they are charged they would wait until they were married and have the husbands pay the bills. When a young woman comes in here I know she is going to marry. have seldom failed in my guess. A young beauty was here the other day who was a $75 customer. I knew her well, and when Children have a dread of having teeth extracted, but when it comes to filling I had rather have a child than any one else. They seldom flinch under the operation. On the other hand I have known men who stood up before cannon during the war, and who never quailed, who turned pale when they entered a

The Latest Hold-Up.

The two men who had been sitting together in the seat near the door of the car became engaged in animated controversy, and their loud voices attracted the attention of all the other passengers. Suddenly one of them rose up and said:
