U. S. TUBERCULIN TESTS OF CATTLE

An experiment limited to the District of Columbia in 1919, tuberculin area-testing of cattle now embraces almost all the United States and has brought the number of "modified accredited" counties to well above 1,500 and the number of herds to 169,356.

The department of agriculture announces the addition of 20 counties with a total area of 15,000 square miles and a cattle population estimated at 450,000 animals. The counties are scattered over 11 States.

"As far as our educational work is concerned," Dr. A. E. Wight, federal chief of tuberculosis eradication, says, "our efforts are just about ended. The purpose is generally understood and the benefit of healthy cattle appreciated. We expect testing and the elimination of reactors to go on until bovine tuberculosis is conquered throughout the nation. Already infestation is slight in all but 139 counties."

The county area idea owes its inception to experiments conducted solely within the District of Columbia no earlier than 1910. There were 1,701 head of cattle in two herds, and tests revealed 18.87 per cent were victims of tuberculosis. Regularly prescribed control measures were invoked, and for the last five years there has been no infestation at all. This initial success, Dr. Wight says, created the theory that whole counties successfully could be handled as test areas.

An accredited county is one in which tuberculosis has been found to affect no more than one-half of one per cent of the cattle in it, as determined by official testing, and in which all animals reacting to the tuberculosis test have been removed from the herds. North Carolina, where original infestation was slight, is expected to be the first State to become fully accredited. Others that are nearing the goal include Maine, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and Idaho.

Only three states, California, Alabama and Arkansas, do not cooperate with the federal government in eradication work. A number of owners in these states, however, stand their own loss of reactors. In all the other states, local and federal funds are used in collaboration for compensation to owners of diseased cattle that are slaughtered.

"While considerable work is being done independently in California," Dr. Wight says, "the situation is not conducive to the best results. Owners of reactors can ill afford to lose their cattle. Our work makes ultimate success contingent upon some form of remuneration other than that naturally to be gained from the advantage of healthy herds."

In addition to increased production Dr. Wight says, tuberculin testing gives rise to greater profits through increased market outlet. He believes that, in time, public demand for milk from accredited herds will make test universal in the United States. There are 1,537 cities and towns, including all the great metropolitan districts that have ordinances requiring all milk sold within their boundaries come from tested herds. In addition 555 other cities and towns require the herds be tested or milk pasteurized.

Another benefit, Dr. Wight ascribes to tuberculosis eradication is the fact that the number of cattle retained as unfit at all federally inspected slaughter houses has decreased from 2.5 per cent of the total offered in 1916 to 0.95 at present.

"How did the Smith wedding go off?"

"Fine until the parson asked the bride if she'd obey her husband."

"What happened then?"

"She replied, 'Do you think I'm crazy?' And the groom, who was in a sort of a daze, replied, 'I do.'"
