The Westminster Gazette, the new evening Liberal paper, which seems to us as good as evening papers are, invites comments on its color, a shade of green, which Carlyle would probably have considered a compliment to Robespierre's complexion. The managers however consider it restful to the eyes, and therefor easy to read. We do not. Green is restful, undoubtedly, but if the managers will look at coal dust on a meadow they will see that black upon green is not. Readers want to see the let ters easily, not the paper. Pink paper blurs the types much less, but the color which of all others throws ink into best relief is saffron yellow. It is abominably ugly, but if the editor of the Westminster Gazette will look at any of the Sanscrit manuscripts on arsenicated paper in the British Museum, he will see that intense yellow throws up even fine black lines. There is another shade, a kind of putty color, used by Mr. Quaritch in his wonderfully cheap Arabic edition of the Koran, which makes type quite strangely clear. It may, however, require a special ink.
