1. Pour a glassful of water into a clean bottle, cork it and shake it up violently for a minute or two. If the shaking causes the development of a bad smell, sewage or animal contamination is to be suspected.

2. Add to a small glassful of the water several drops of dilute sulphuric acid and stir. Then pour in two drops of a weak solution of permanganate of potash or enough to give a faint rose color. Cover the glass with a saucer and let it stand for ten minutes. If at the end of that time the rose color has wholly disappeared, the water is probably unwholesome. 3. Put into a clean, dry glass several drops of a solution of nitrate of silver and then pour in several ounces of the drinking water. If it becomes milky, add a few drops of dilute nitric acid. Should the milkiness not now nearly all clear away the water—if not gotten near the seacoast —is probably contaminated with sewage. 4. Having two perfectly clean eight-ounce glass-stoppered bottles, nearly fill one with the suspected water in its natural state and the other with the water after it has been boiled 30 minutes. Put a teaspoonful of white granulated sugar into each bottle and shake till the sugar is dissolved. Then keep them, side by side, at a temperature of about 80 degrees, for three days. If the unboiled water rapidly clouds up and shows a marked fermentation, emitting an odor of ranced butter, it is probably contaminated with sewage. If the boiled water shows any sign of fer-
