All the speakers made a point of what they regarded as a contractural relation between the State and the institutions established by the various continuing appropriation acts. It was also brought out that the legality of the repealing measure may be attacked because at one swoop it undertakes to repeal many different acts and parts of different acts. As the speakers announced their belief that it would be impossible, or, at any rate, very difficult to continue colleges without State aid, and that such being the case it should be arranged so that they should not be obliged to come as supplicants before every session of the Legislature.
