Practical.—We have read much and written something relative to rail-way and steam carriages, and have endear ored to show their utility and economy still the experiment is untried in the country. Mr. Carter sets the matter at rest. In his last letter he says:-As we were anxious to witness

The ordinary progress is miles the hour, but of course may greatly accelerated if necessary. There are several engines between rail way, which ply regularly between extensive collieries and the town, a distance of three or four miles. It is old enough to see the smoke arising that of a steam boat, and the carts inde about at a distance, with no visit the expert to move or govern them. The expert ment has here been fairly and succ ly tried, and I see no reason why portation by steam is not as pr upon land as upon water.
