[From the Dollar Newspaper SONG-TO ZOE. BY C. J. MELLEN.

When you see the lake-waves glisten As the moonlight pours above them-When to their soft sounds you listen, As the zephyrs gently move them, Deem you not that love and duty Prompt them thus to speak and shine? Due to Zoe's heart and beauty, Is their homage—so is mine.

When the morning birds are singing In their sweet, retiring wildness-When the evening breeze is flinging Odors where it walks in mildness-Know that every gentle lisper Leaves its gift at Zoe's shrine; Birds and zephyrs ever whisper

Love and duty-just like mine.

When the fruits or flowers are rarest, As the spring or autumn flushes-When the sky and stars are fairest. And the fountain clearest gushes-Fruits and flowers have incense for you-Sky and stars light up your shrine, And the fountain streams adore you,

With a passion-just like mine. I have seen you smile so warmly On these tokens of devotion-Waves and winds that sued so calmly, You have answered with emotion; Colder worship at your shrine, And your heart to all they rendered, Was awake-why not to mine?

BY DORA M'NELLIE. Gently and quietly the night fold-it : ed its wings over a pleasant home wl among the Green Mountains, where a happy circle was gathered around do a blazing fire of maple wood. It cu was one of those old-fashioned home- on steads of which every one has a bright op idea; tall trees bent over it as if to hu shelter the young hearts that beat gr happily under that roof, and peace-ed fully even as the birds that sang to ly them through the long summer days, as dwelt the little mountaineers in their sca secluded home. Their parents had are now been absent a week on a visit to friends at a distance, though it wa was midwinter and the broad ever- nig green forests were thickly covered wa with snow. They were not the peo- ear ple who spend in pleasure the loveli-sta est season God gives us, for little thought could they take of journey-loo ing for amusement when the rich inc fruit and waving grain was ripening for them to gather. It was the farmer's season for flit-so ting now; the harvest moon had long so since waned, and left rich stores in he barn and granary. There were stal- he wart boys to leave at home, who No knew right well what care was need-sto ful—and the parents had not feared to leave the little band alone, with- tuout any protection but their own in- eri nocence, and the care of him in an whom they trusted. Trained as they had been to brave er storm and danger, caring little for sto either, the hardy children had enjoy-th ed the independence of being left "to take care of themselves," as James ru Graham expressed it, and now they ca were recounting all the home duties I they had faithfully performed, for w the absent ones were expected home tw that night, and each little heart beat see happily in the consciousness of hav- fat ing done right. "Well," said James, "I guess fath- th er don't expect to find all the corn husked when he gets home." - he "No, nor the old shed boarded so he nicely," said Richard.

"What have you got to tell father, wa Annie?" said James to a little gentle the creature, who looked like a little are white morning-glory with blue eyes. ha "Oh! I shall tell how good we have all been, and how I helped you feed wi the lamb every day." "You'll tell him we've been good, con too, won't you, cousin Marion?" ask- qui ed Richard, for the roguish boy be- ser gan to remember certain instances run of his teasing and fun, which he ' thought might not sound very well Ma in the account.
