LINESON THE PRESENT WAR. waves of agonizing despair and an-

Hark! to the cannons' dread alarms, List to the trumpets' call to arms! See, from your line the musket-flash, And pause to view the battle's crash.

For now the hostile banners meet, Down pours the sun with mad'ning heat; For North and South have met to-day, In horrid strife and dread array.

Father and son in strife have drawn, With passions dire each breast is torn. "Submit or die," the father cries, "1 first must fall," the son replies.

Out from their sheaths the sabre flies, With deadly skill each foeman vies; To guard and parry, cut and thrust, Till one or both shall bite the dust. Steel rings to steel 'mid sparks of fire,

And bitter taunts with looks of ire Now intermingle with each cry Of pain and mortal agony. "Tis done! Hell with her fiery eyes

Gloats o'er the deed with fiendish cries, As on the ground the father lies, Sighs forth a prayer, then gasps and dies. But who shall paint the widow's woes,

Or who portray the mother's throes When she the fatal knowledge gains, "Thy husband by thy son was slain." Let us unite, my friend sincere, As we our sympathies can share,

In prayers that Heaven will shortly close This horrid war with all its woes. M. H. [From the N. Y. Mercury.]
