THE CLOUDS. BY CHARLES WELLINGTON.

The clouds seem pillars of the sky. Above on Nature's hills of grace; Of every form and brilliant dye,

The splendid props of heaven are they-The pyramids of endless day; Whose changing hues and varying form Foretell the zephyr and the storm.

And, soaring upward through the air. Embrace the sun, then haste away.

They dip their wings in azure blue, Baptize the hills in pearla of dew, Renew the songs of brook and rilla And all the earth welcome fill.

The clouds avail the promised bow, Whose radians beams do cheer us so; They testify to race of man, That God is good in will and plana

The clouds enamel brilliant hues, In spectral light to all our views; Through shining hours of crystal love, From God the Father-God above.

The morning clouds, how bright they seem! In early morning's rising beam! When fair Creation wakes to life, Puts on her day-born beauties rife!

The morning clouds! they speak of hope, The gates of promise gently ope; They speak of seasons mild and fair, The lover's joys, the hayman's care.

The evening clouds! of burnished light, In mellow beams and tinte of blue, How sad, indeed, their parting light, As now the sun bid them "adieu!"

They shine and dazzle on the sky As shines the paradise on high; They tell the closing of the day, In brightness passing quick sway!

The clouds seem airy couches home, From Olive's height He in them rose, Who soon again will in them come, And take His friends to their repose.

They are the mystic cars of light That bear the angels in their flight; They darken round the throne in storm, When God puts on a frowing form.
