It is for all the world just like Granny Wilkes's pitcher. Many's the time I've given Lissy a drink out of it. 'Just a little water, Aunt Becky, please,' she'd say; 'I'm so very, very dry.' Poor creetur, it's many a long year since. But 'taint no trouble for me to see her now in my mind as she was then, with her big, brown eyes, and thin face, and

There was two hundred acre of land in the farm, lots of stock, field after field in wheat and grain, a good water privilege, and plenty of good timber. Granny was a master hand to work -always busy, and always proud of telling how much she did. She was a sot woman in her way-sotter than anybody I ever knew, except Jake and he was 'ad enough. Granny and he as got along good enough together, though: they both worked and saved right along steady. Jake was quite on in yearsthirty, I guess-when he married Melissy Drake. Lissy was a nice, plain girl; nobody ever found any fault with her, that I knew on. She used to make dresses, coats, pants and vests for the neighbors, and was handy funeral and wedding times. Folks said Jake had a good wife, though some kind o' wondered how the match came about. How did Jake look, did you say? Well, he wa'n't a bad looking man, by no means. He was tall and kind of spare, with black hair and eyes, and a small, straight nose. Somehow, I remember his nose, it was so straight—came out sharp as a line in
