The Widow's Mite.

It was the last night of the year. The widow Bruges sat alone in her apart ment-for she rented but one, and that was a small and scantily furnished room though she managed to make it look quite spacious and comfortable by the disposition of its furniture—gazing into the embers, which, though they were fas expiring, still sent out a genial warmth Her work—a bit of nice embroidery—had dropped into the clean white hand kerchief which was spread over her lap and her head was resting on her hand her task was so near completed that sh indulged herself in a luxury she was bu little accustomed to-a moment's cessa tion from toil. The light of the lamp which fell partially on her face, revealed a countenance deeply marked with sor row and care; but that face was youth ful still, and grief had not banished beauty from those features—it had bu thrown over them a vail which concealed their sparkling brilliancy, while it made their loveliness more charming. The pensiveness and quiet submission re vealed in the depth of these large, lus trous, black eyes, the calmness and deer thought of that white brow, and the smile of benevolence which played around that mouth—it was hard for thos features to learn thus to look; the sou was almost crushed before it would for get its pride; but now heaven's seal wa impressed upon that countenance s deeply that it could never be obliterated Alone! no, the widow was not alon in her apartment. On the humble coucl lay a child of seven years, sweetly slum bering. The little girl did not much re semble her mother in her features though to the heart of her parent sh was only the more dear for that; for it that sweet little face she had ever befor her the perfect miniature of him whor she loved so well, but so unwisely. Sh loved her the more fondly for that; fo though there had been moments where she invoked heaven's bitterest curses of him who had squandered her wealth a the dram-shop and the gambling table and had cruelly neglected, and finall deserted her and her babe-she had lon ago buried the remembrance of hi crimes, and thought only of the fer brief years when they were happy to

The widow sat resting her head on he hand, and gazing into the dying embers The night was cold, the snow lay thic on the earth, and the wind was sweepin about her dwelling. She thought of th hundreds in the great city who were the night suffering from hunger and cold and her heart went up to heaven in grat tude for the mercies with which it ha surrounded her. It was true, all th money she possessed on earth was a b of silver lying on the table beside her and that she had promised little Ann should purchase her, on the morrow, New Year's gift. But then her rent f the next quarter was paid, she had fu and provisions enough to last her f the next fortnight, and the work she ha
