THE BOUQUET.

"MUCH YET REMAINS UNSUNG."

From the New York Statesman. The following lines from the pensive muse of our former correspondent, the Boston Bard, copied from the Westchester Herald, breathe the same Strain of which characterizes the greater portion of his poetry. We regret to learn, from one of his friends, that they were prompted by his present situation, and come freshly from a feeling heart.

CONSUMPTION.

Thou herald pale of death and fate, Cadaverous and cold, What numerous pains thy presence wait,

What mortal wees, untold! Chill flows the warm and genial blood, Beneath thy angry nod; And briefly perish in the bud

The fairest works of God. Relentless tyrant of our race! Deceiver of the wise! Death shows his image in thy face,

And he thou look'st on-dies! Aye, withers sileat, sad and pale-Tho' slow his doom yet sure; Thy breath empoisons every gale, Thy victim to secure.

To-day thy flattery lulls our fear, And health trips jocund by; To-morrow all our hopes are sear, And o'er the wreck we sigh; Our spirits sink depressed and weak,

The orbs of vision close; Death sets his seal upon the check-We sink beneath our woes.

Yet hail!—thou tyrant fell and dread! Thy ghastly visage show; So oft this heart before hath bled, It fears no future blow,

Come, prey upon this wasting form-Thy tortures all combine; Pour on this head thy fiercest storm, Till I, O Death! am thine. BOSTON BARD.
