

papers and letters for evidence to implicate him, and that without this as a part it seems to me very clear that the evidence thus obtained should be excluded -

He or could not have been compelled by any process known to the law to produce the evidence himself and the principle of this rule it seems to me must nearly exclude evidence obtained by the commission of such an outrage as it would seem has been committed by the agents of the prosecution if the account referred to be true.

It is but a branch of the principle which excludes confessions of the accused when made under duress, or inducements
