POETRY.

THE DRUNKARD'S LAMENT. BY JAMES STILLMAN. Spare, memory spare, my tortur'a breast, In pity let the past be hidden, In shades of darkness let it rest, Nor to torment me come unbidden. I dare not trust a wand'ring thought, Back o'er my by-gone days to stray, My life has been with folly fraught

And made me what I am-to-day. Nor on the future dare I look, I dread to see its prospects rise, Of hope bereft, my spirit broke, To all I fain would close my eyes. What can the future bring to me? Alas! what can I hope, or crave, What else than this remains for me? An early death, a drunkard's grave.

My life seems now a living death, Corruption has its work begun, And passing strangers scent my breath And strive the loathsome smell to shun. My dearest friends with blushing face,

Turn from me now, with weeping eye,

And sighing at my deep disgrace, With hurried footsteps pass me by. My days are misery, and my nights With horror upon horror teems, I can't describe the forms which fright Me in my wild and fever'd dreams. The brand of shame is on my brow, To dark despair my soul is driv'n,

The fire is burning in me now!

Like some plague-stricken wretch I feel, A loathsome lazar and a pest, Beyond the pow'r of man to heal, And wand'ring Cain who knows no rest; Reproach'd by conscience, self-condemn'd, Yet to the poison still I fly.

I feel abhorr'd by earth and heav'n.

A transient solace that bestows A short oblivion to my grief, But soon the wild excitement goes, And leaves me shaking like a leaf. Nought human can for me avail O father, God! a wretch restore, Ere the last link of life doth fail, And I am lost for-ever-more.

VERY GOOD ADVICE.
